After overcoming Hodgkin's lymphoma, 23-year-old cancer survivor Ally Walsh is using her experience to help other young adults facing the same challenges. Walsh has created a vlog, started a support group, and is working as a mentor for other young cancer patients. Her goal is to provide support and encouragement to others who are going through a similar experience.

Walsh was diagnosed with Hodgkin's lymphoma in 2017, when she was 21 years old. She underwent six months of chemotherapy and radiation therapy, and is now in remission. During her treatment, Walsh found that there was a lack of support and resources for young adults with cancer. She decided to start a vlog to share her story and provide support to others who were going through a similar experience.

Walsh's vlog, called "Ally's Journey," has quickly gained a following. She shares her experiences with cancer treatment, as well as tips and advice for other young adults facing the same challenges. Walsh also hosts a support group for young adults with cancer, where they can share their experiences and provide support to one another.

In addition to her vlog and support group, Walsh is also working as a mentor for other young cancer patients. She provides support and encouragement to other young adults who are going through cancer treatment. Walsh's goal is to help other young adults feel less alone and to provide them with the support they need to get through their treatment.

Walsh is an inspiration to other young adults who are facing cancer. She is a reminder that cancer does not define you, and that you can still achieve your goals even after a cancer diagnosis. Walsh's story is a powerful example of the importance of support and encouragement for young adults facing cancer.

Here are some tips from Ally Walsh for young adults facing cancer:

- Don't be afraid to talk about your feelings.
- Find a support group or mentor who can provide support and encouragement.
- Stay positive and focus on the things you can control.
- Don't give up on your dreams.
- You are not alone.

If you are a young adult facing cancer, please know that you are not alone. There are resources and support available to you. Ally Walsh is a great example of someone who has overcome cancer and is now using her experience to help others. Her story is an inspiration to us all.
